

Game Changers: Going Local to Defeat Violent Extremism

Violent extremism is a major threat to our security and way of life. In recent years, we have seen a rise in terrorist attacks around the world, from the 9/11 attacks in the United States to the recent attacks in Paris and Brussels. These attacks have shown that violent extremism is a global problem that requires a global solution.

Traditional approaches to countering violent extremism have focused on military and law enforcement measures. However, these approaches have had limited success in preventing and countering extremism. In recent years, there has been a growing recognition that local communities play a critical role in preventing and countering violent extremism.

Local communities are often the first to see the signs of radicalization. They are also the most likely to be affected by the consequences of extremism, such as violence and social unrest. As a result, local communities have a vested interest in preventing and countering extremism.

There are a number of things that local communities can do to prevent and counter violent extremism. These include:

- Providing support for at-risk individuals
- Creating a positive and inclusive environment
- Countering extremist propaganda
- Working with law enforcement to identify and disrupt extremist networks

Local communities are not alone in their efforts to prevent and counter violent extremism. They can also receive support from national and international organizations. The United Nations, for example, has a number of programs that support local communities in their efforts to prevent and counter extremism.

The fight against violent extremism is a long-term one. However, by working together, local communities and national and international organizations can make a real difference in preventing and countering extremism.
